World Agricultural Supply and Demand Estimates

The global wheat outlook for 2022/23 wheat is for reduced supplies, consumption, trade, and stocks. Supplies are lowered 1.9 million tons to 1,057.7 million on reduced production for the United States and Argentina more than offsetting higher EU production although world production remains at a record. Argentina is lowered 1.5 million tons to 17.5 million with reductions in both area harvested and yield on continued widespread dry conditions. EU production is raised 2.7 million tons to 134.8 million, mainly on higher government estimates from Poland and Germany.

Grain: World Markets and Trade

Global production is forecast lower this month but still at a record. Lower crop estimates for the United States and Argentina more than offset an increase for the European Union. Consumption is revised lower as reduced food, seed, and industrial (FSI) use in several countries is only partially offset by higher feed and residual use in the European Union. Ending stocks are down primarily for the United States, where stocks are forecast at the lowest since 2007/08. Reduced exports from the United States and Argentina are only partially offset by higher forecast EU exports

RUSSIA IS CONSIDERING ABOLISHING GRAIN EXPORT QUOTAS

Last season it was 11 million tons of grain, including 8 million tons of wheat.

The grain export quota is a measure introduced by the government of the Russian Federation to meet the needs of the domestic market.

What it will be in the new season (from February 15 to June 30) is still unknown.

Africa Food Prices Are Soaring Amid High Import Reliance

Staple food prices in sub-Saharan Africa surged by an average 23.9 percent in 2020-22—the most since the 2008 global financial crisis. This is commensurate to an 8.5 percent rise in the cost of a typical food consumption basket (beyond generalized price increases).

Global factors are partly to blame. Because the region imports most of its top staple foods—wheat, palm oil, and rice—the pass-through from global to local food prices is significant, nearly one-to-one in some countries.
